How are identity and freedom related? Many countries are celebrating national holidays these days—in Canada and the United States, Argentina and Venezuela, Algeria and Malawi, and so many others. This practice of honoring who we are and where we come from reminds us that identity is important. But identity can also be tough to define.

Over the last couple centuries, it has become common to think about "identity" as something we shape. To be "free" is to have the power to choose our identity—not just on a national level, but on a personal one. And there is truth in this. God gave us free will, and with this gift, he lets us shape who we are through our actions. But sometimes, our scientific understanding of the human person leads us to see people, including ourselves, as products of our choices. Our thirst for freedom dissolves into a thirst for control, and the more power, influence, and technology we can acquire to shape ourselves and our surroundings, the better. But John Paul II reminds us that this is not the whole story. A person is not a mass of biological material to be shaped or controlled. A person is not simply "there." Every person is uniquely and intentionally created by God to exist for all eternity. You—yes, you—are God's choice.

In our struggle to understand ourselves and our past, we sometimes forget that our identity does not begin with us. It begins with God. We may have the freedom to shape who we become, but if our choices separate us from our Creator, we will not find our identity; we will lose it. True freedom comes from knowing ourselves as chosen by God and loved beyond all telling. The more we respond to God's grace in our lives, illuminated by the Word of God and by the teachings of the Church, the more we discover who we are from the One who created us. In Christ, daughters of St. Paul

A single act of love makes the soul return to life.—St. Maximilian Kolbe
